Paris. "Something better must be devised than the annual murder at Faneuil Hall." Gives arguments why the fair should not be held in England. The writer had a prophetic vision of "Philadelphia... They have long been jealous of us. If it was a godly jealousy, they have an opportunity to gratify its dictates." The sixteenth national A.S. Bazaar should be announced in the usual way. Thinks that $5000 might be raised. The remainder of the English goods "might do extremely well in some small hall in Boston." The Liberty Bell would be printed as usual in Boston, but published in Philadelphia. The addressees are to take counsel with Garrison, Wendell Phillips, and E. Quincy. "The latter would make much better bell than I have ever done."

To Mrs. Lucretia (Coffin) Mott, Edward Morris Davis,

«Paris» Refers to a letter from Sarah Pugh consulting the writer about the advisability of sending an agent to England to solicit for the Philadelphia fair. At that time this did not seem to the writer advisable because of the provincial nature of the Philadelphia bazaar. Now the writer suggests that they secure all possible advantages "by assuming yourselves, after consultation... with our committee in Boston, the style and title of '16th National A.S. Bazaar, at Philadelphia'." Because of their commitments for the Freeman, they could not, like the Bostonians, turn over the whole proceeds to the National Society, but they could state that money above $1000 would be paid over as usual. The Liberty Bell, printed in Boston, should have the imprimatur of Philadelphia.

St. Germain. The writer received the addressee's letter at St. Germain, where she has been staying with Lady Elgin. The present letter will be transported by the writer's cousin, Barbara, who is about to marry M. Bodechen, whom she met in Algeria. The writer refers to a "little letter" from the addressee to "my cousin Florence Nightingale," apparently asking her to write for the Liberty Bell. The writer points out that, if the addressee had been to see Florence Nightingale two or three times, she "would not have asked her to write her name-much less anything requiring a decided effort ..." Florence Nightingale could do it. "She is very much worn exhausted & fevered in her physical frame." Describes the impression Miss Nightingale makes on the men who consult her. She has been in London, "working silently at different reforms," besides setting in order her reports from Crimean days, and has been occupied with a commission appointed to inquire into the sanitary state of the army. "I know all this-I was with her in the spring before coming to Paris ... & I wrote a quantity of letters mostly to poor souls sending strange petitions ..." The writer thanks the addressee for news of Harriet Martineau, whom she praises. Has seen the addressee's son "looking cheery & hearty to." Sends love to Mrs. Elizabeth Follen and Miss Susan [redacted].
